[Music] Hello again and welcome to concise curiosity, the seventh module in the copyrighting 101 course. Now, in this module, we're going to cover how to write copy that hooks your readers and keeps them reading until the very end. As always, quick disclaimer. I highly recommend watching every previous module before you watch this one, as we'll be building on the concepts that we've already learned in the past modules. And to be honest, if you don't understand those in depth, applying the concepts you're about to learn will be very hard and very complicated. So go ahead and go watch the other modules first and then we'll get right into this module. You see there are two principles that if you don't understand can put a massive dent in the effectiveness of your copy and they stem from this. The human brain is wired to prefer efficiency and stimulation. In human speak or in layman speak, we don't like wasting energy and we don't like to be bored. Simple as that. If you have to get a task done, if you have to do something and you can either do it in 30 minutes or an hour and they get the same outcome, well, you prefer 30 minutes. You want it to be efficient. We also don't like to be bored. If you can prefer, if you can like choose between being bored all day or being entertained, well, you try to be entertained. That's why we watch movies, TV shows, video games, etc. We don't like to be bored. Even when you decide to choose quote unquote boredom, what you're choosing is not boredom. You're choosing to entertain yourself with your mind and your ideas. That's what the greatest entrepreneurs are. They just hate being bored. The issue is they choose to solve boredom by solving other problems. That's how I entertain myself by making these complicated modules. So, we must keep this in mind when writing copy because it'd be a shame for you to nail their specific conditions, craft a perfect problem chain, create urgency and scarcity, offer someone to just click off because your copy is too complicated or boring. You have to optimize your copy for efficiency and stimulation. Remember, we aren't writing English papers here. We're writing words that grab attention, hold it, so we can give them our sales message to transfer that belief over the bridge of trust. So, what we're going to do in this module is we're going to talk about how do we combat both of these enemies of great copy? How do we hook someone? How do we not let them fall off? How do we hold their attention and deliver our message in the best way possible? We do that by starting with the Cub method. I discovered the Cub method from Robert Bly. He's a wellrespected author and copywriter and he developed this method to ensure that our copy abides by those principles above. The Cub method. We'll go over what cub means in a second, but this is built on the assumption that your readers and viewers are looking for any and every reason to stop consuming your copy and carry on with their life. Think about videos, reels, things that you read. Your brain is looking for any instance where it gets bored to move on. Because just the act of moving on and swapping what you're doing fights boredom in your brain. This is why kids of this generation have such a hard time focusing and building

7. Concise-Curiosity

businesses and doing anything great. Even people like you who are into entrepreneurship, you swap what you're doing all the time. You swap offers, you swap niches, you swap skills. You go from copyrighting to growth operating to agency to this because as soon as it gets hard, you want to swap because your brain thinks, "Oh, well, that'll be more fun, so we'll just change." So, you must assume that everyone that you're talking to is looking for any and every reason to stop consuming what you're presenting them and carry on with their life. For this reason, we need to use the Cub method to ensure that readers make it through our sales messages in the fastest, easiest, and most enjoyable way possible. That is the key. Once you have a compelling sales message, it's not good enough. You have to make it fast to consume, easy to consume, and enjoyable to consume. And Robert Blee states that there are three main reasons why a reader wouldn't make it through your sales message. Confusing, unbelievable, and boring copy. Hence the name Cub. So if your copy is too confusing, it's too hard for the brain to understand. They'll move on to something easier. If your copy is unbelievable, meaning it's too good to be true, people see it as a scam and they move on. If your copy is boring, meaning it's just not entertaining, it's too hard, it's like sludge trying to read through it, they don't care about the sales batches. They'll just move on. It sounds silly, but that's just what it is. So, you must fight confusing, unbelievable, and boring copy with all you've got. And we'll go over how to fix each one in a second. But before we dig into the details, let's overview how to use this method effectively. So, we'll talk about how to fight each one, but let's go over how does this fit into your daily routine of writing copy. So, if you go to write a sales page, how do you use this method? The first thing is you must write an emotional first draft. Copy is all about transferring emotion and belief. And so if you have no emotion there to begin with, there's no sense in refining it. So it's going to sound kind of kind of counterintuitive. But the first step to writing great copy is to not worry about writing great copy. Don't worry about the spelling mistakes. Don't worry about the cub method. Just literally spew out the raw emotion that you're trying to convey and focus on volume. Put down a million ideas at that at this stage. There is no such thing as a bad idea. Let your brain just crank. Let it spew out everything you're trying to get across. What's funny is I you know I coach a lot of people in copy elite like yourself and on these coaching calls someone will send me a piece of copy. I'll talk about how it doesn't make sense or whatever and then they'll they'll stop me and they say well here's what I was trying to say and then they'll just speak the most beautiful piece of copy and I'm like why don't you just write that down and they're like oh yeah I should have done that. Why does this happen? Because when you go to write you start to get in perfectionism mode but when you're writing you just need to put it down. Don't worry about the spelling mistakes. Don't worry about if it makes sense or not. Just spew out the raw emotions. That's the first step. Step two is to take a break. Get your mind completely off of copy. Go outside. Do something active and don't come back until you're fresh mentally. Until you've hit a full reset on your brain and you're not even thinking about copying the principles, don't come back. And this sounds so counterintuitive, but I promise this is how the best writers write. This is how you're going to get the best results in your writing. So, first draft, write a super emotional first draft. Write as many as you have to just do volume. Then take a break. Then come back and start looking for the cub. So start by looking for anything confusing. Remember your copy should be so simple that a monkey can understand it. Make simplify everything and you'll start to realize that simplifying is hard. But the more you absorb the pain of action, meaning you have to go through the pain of simplifying, the more you take that pain of action off of your customers and it's easier for them to take action. So if you're lazy and your copy is not simplified, it doesn't have a big idea, it uses complicated language, it doesn't follow a train of thought, you make it hard for your customers to then follow the message and buy the stuff. But if you make it hard for yourself and simplify your copy and edit it over and over and over and simplify it, it's easier for them to follow along and take action, meaning you make more money. And we'll go over how to simplify in a second, but that's just how you should do it. And then you just repeat the process. So once you've focused on simplifying things, you take another break. Forget about simplicity. Forget about the copyrighting. Forget about principles. Go outside. do whatever. Then come back and look for any copy that is unbelievable. Let's do the same thing but just for unbelievable. Then you guessed it, take another break, come back and fix anything that is boring. So the point of me putting this in here was just to show you you got to stay focused on one state of mind at a time and then take a break to reset and come back and focus on the next thing. That's how you want to edit copy in the best way possible. For example, if you went through this course and you learned about pain, confidence, problem chains, confusing, curiosity, text, subtext, it's there's so much stuff that it's hard for you to do all of it at once, which is fine. You learn one at a time. One at a time. Same with with reviewing copy. So, moving on to fixing confusing copy. So this is what you'll do when you're in step three. So you've already written your emotional copy. You've taken a break. Now you come back and you want to fix copy that is confusing. Here's what we do. First, you want to remove esoteric points. So don't go so in-depth about details and stuff that your audience doesn't care about or things they don't need to know. And as always, this is very um highly dependent on specific conditions. So some audience will want some more logical, more technical stuff. If you're selling something very technical, very niche, you're going to have more esoteric stuff in there. But the main principle here is people care more about the results than they do how you get there. Focus on the outcomes. What do the how's get you? We'll go over examples later. Next, avoid confusing language. Simplify everything. Third to fifth grade reading level. Use layman speak. Don't use confusing language to try to sound smart. This is not an English paper.

7. Concise-Curiosity

It's a sales message. We don't care whether they think you're smart or not. We care whether they buy. And when someone's in a an emotional like monkey brain, it doesn't matter if they're a PhD scientist, they want simple language so they can understand what you're trying to say to them and then move on in the quickest way possible. Think about when you're trying to solve a problem and you're in this state of problem solving. You don't want someone to sit here and use the biggest words possible to tell you how to write this email subject line or how to how to fix your email deliverability. You want them to tell you in the most simple, straightforward language possible so that you can get the information and solve the problem. Avoid confusing language. And you can take your copy, throw it in the chatbt and ask it to spit it out in the third, fifth grade reading level. That can help you simplify it even more. Next is avoid vague explanations. So use specific, concrete, and visual language. Use language that appeals to the five senses. You want them to have a movie going on in their head. So when they read your copy and you're explaining something, a situ a situation, a scenario, a pain point, make sure they can visualize what's going on. Don't just say, "Life sucks." Say every time you walk past the mirror, you catch a glimpse of your gut peeking out of your shirt and you you look around and hope that no one else saw that and you can't help but just feel ashamed of how much weight you have. Make it visual. They can see it. Next is distracting ideas slash rabbit holes. This is a big mistake I see beginner copywriters write. They they they want to they have so many good angles, so many good ideas to pitch a product, but they put them all in one sales page and it becomes so distracting and it doesn't stay on point. Think about a sales message kind of like light. When there's a lot of light, it might cover a big area, but it's not very powerful. But when you have a laser, the same amount of light, but focused, it can burn through steel. And you want your you want your sales message to to burn to cut through steel. And you do that by having one big simple useful idea. Don't stray away from the main idea. It's it isn't worth the distraction that it causes. Your other angle might be great, but use that for a different piece of copy. Don't put it in this one because it's going to distract from the main idea you've already got going on. Next, fixing unbelievable copy. Now, this is 100% dependent on specific conditions. So, what's believable to your audience depends on what your audience believes. And what your audience believes is going to be completely different to what a different audience believes. So, if I'm selling something to brand new beginner entrepreneurs who have never made money online, making a h 100k a month or a million dollars a month sounds crazy. But if I'm selling to seasoned entrepreneurs who are making, you know, $2 million a year, getting up to a million dollar a month doesn't sound insane. It sounds very believable because their beliefs are different. So, it always depends on your audience. And how we do this is you can cut out the unbelievable section completely or you can make the claim more believable by adding very specific and compelling proof. And you can also relate to the reader

and viewer using specific conditions so that they trust you more and then what you say becomes more believable because they trust you. So, this one's pretty straightforward, but just make sure that your claims are believable to exactly who you're talking to. Once again, specific conditions. That's really the the key to this one. Next is fixing boring copy. The first step is to don't talk too much about what they already know. Once again, specific conditions. You have to match their awareness level. So, watch specific conditions. watch problem chains cuz that's going to basically make it impossible for you to not talk about what they already know because you'll be matching their awareness level. Perfect. And we'll go over examples of this, but imagine you came to me, you came to my channel trying to learn copywriting and you click on a video and I start talking about why you need money and why you should want to make money online and you're bored out of your mind because you you already you're you're every waking moment you're spending is trying to make money online. So you don't need to be sold that. You already you already sold it. You already believe it. It's already part of you. So by talking about stuff you already know and believe, it's boring because you already get it. And this is like this is just human. This is how humans work. If I was to sit here and teach you 1 plus 1 equals 2 over and over again for eight years, you'd be bored out of your mind because you learned it immediately as a kid and now now you move on. You solve the next problem. So match the awareness level. Number two is not enough emotions being pushed. So we don't want to sit here and just hit people with facts and sound like a non-fiction book. Copy is about emotion. It's the language of emotion. So make sure you go through text and subtext, pain and confidence, and use concrete and visual language. Next is using way too many complicated words. We already talked about that. Make it simple, concise as possible. How can you say the same thing with as little words as possible? Mountain copy, not brick copy. So, you don't want your copy to all be the same exact sentence length. You want it to flow nicely. So, use use connecting words, use phrases. It's true. People like this don't know XYZ. And to be honest with you, that's because things are so like vary your sentence in. And we'll go we'll go over some examples of this in a second. It'll be easy for you to see it. But also make your copy visually easy and fun to read. I see a lot of you guys mess this up even in your outreaches and your stuff for clients. Even if it's a VSSL and someone's just reading it, use bold, use underline, use italics, use color. Do you see how much more fun this PDF is to go through just because I use little arrows and colors and bold and and italicize? Make it visually fun. Where are we at? Yeah. Vague explanations. Once again, use specific concrete visual language. language that appeals to the five senses to talk about what it looks like, what it smells like, what it feels like, what it what what it sounds like, all those things. All right. So, what I thought we'd do is the best way to understand this is by just going over some examples. So, let's go ahead and do that right now. Let's get to it. So, this mirror will be linked below this school module. But the best thing you can do as always is to study copy on your own and synthesis. The next module will have tons of great copy that you can study, dissect, and put through these examples for yourself. Let's go over just one example of each one. So, confusing versus simple copy. I want you to look at Virgil's old loom on the on the left and Matthews on the right. Look at this process section. Virgil says, "Targeted lead magnet system. Deep dive discovery. Uncover your targets deep latent conditions. Lead magnet launchpad. Create an email opt-in page with highv value freebie. RB email campaign. Build a personalized fivestep relationship building campaign." You guys might be thinking, "Oh, that sounds juicy. That sounds good." It doesn't appeal to emotions. These are literally just features. It's not talking about what that does for us. He doesn't talk about how it makes their life easy or safe or big outcome. It just it's literally like just like things versus Matthews. This isn't perfect, but you can see the difference. Get to know your niche. Look at how simple that language is versus uncovering your target audience's deepest lating conditions. Get to know your niche and position your channel in a way that gets high ticket leads coming to you. Simple visual. your channel, your target audience. Pretty cool. And once again, it's all about specific conditions. But just remember, the human brain hates complication when it comes to being sold to. When you're in the mode of solving a problem, you don't want to read a research paper. You want to know what you should do and then go do it. So, keep it simple. Avoid too much technical talk. Here's another good example. Our CRM pipeline architecture uses an autot triggered web hook that syncs with our Zapier pass via whatever versus when someone books a call, we instantly send their info into our sales system. No manual work. You see the difference? All right, let's look at some third grade versus or 12th grade versus third grade reading level. So here over here we have like a I think it's the 12th grade reading level. The acceptance letter from Yell University was glowing on the screen. She'd always dreamed of studying at an Ivy League school. Now that dream was within reach, but there was a problem. Her parents couldn't afford to pay the tuition, usable all her savings, talked to a guidance counselor. So, this isn't crazy. There's not a whole lot of big words there, but you can see how hard this is to read versus this insane example over here. Like two of my pieces of copy. I was in a dark place. I've had one goal for the past 10 years, make money online. And I tried almost everything. Graphic design, you name it, I tried and failed it. In 2003, things got real bad. It's so simple. It's so easy to read. Or this one over here. I've had enough. If I hear one more boomer say, just go to college. You get a stable job. I might puke. How can they be so blind? It's so simple. It's so easy to read. Here's another example from Iman. Look at the the mountain copy versus brick copy. Look at how difficult this like you literally look at this and it just looks a freaking word turd. This though is very fun. It just flows right. Look at how it starts off super easy to read. I could double your salary right now. I've had enough. It's so easy. Cool. Now, let's look at this is a this is an OG copy meme you guys are seeing right here. So the story is Matthew, one of his first clients, Matthew had this like nightmare client and the guy forced Matthew to write a sales page with like three mechanisms. Matthew told him it was a bad idea, but he just he kept forcing it on him. Like I sell all this stuff. We're going to talk about all the stuff I sell and not one big idea. And so we had a meme about this um but it's funny. Build a money printing parcel brand while getting jacked, upgrading your mindset, mastering your business in the easiest way possible. And it used to be so much worse. This is actually not so terrible, but he went over it used to be called like get financially jacked, get spiritually jacked, and get mentally jacked and physically jacked. Like he was selling everything all at once. And it was impossible to write a good sales message for it because he's just there's four four ideas. Four big ideas here. This one's actually not so bad. I shouldn't have really copied this one over here. But this is what Matt Matt shout out to Matthew. He actually made this thing somewhat into one big idea. So here he's talking about the personal brand while doing this while doing this. While doing this it better it's better than than the old one. We couldn't find the old one, but uh you get the point. A lot of ideas going on here versus this one. Very, very simple, straightforward. Reveal the secret to money online. How anyone can master the art of digital persuasion to make 5K a month from anywhere in the world. I made 11K in 46 days after I learned this skill. You might think, well, K, that sounds just as long. It sounds a little complicated, but if you really look at it, you'll realize that it's all around one idea. Laser focus. Secret to making money online. The secret digital persuasion. Make money anywhere in the world. Which means online. I made money online after this skill. Digital persuasion. It's all one thing. It's juicy to read, but it's super focused. So, pretty cool. All right, moving on to unbelievable versus believable copy. This is actually from this morning. One of the guys in Copil sent me his offer and I was explaining to him why it needs to be more believable by having like he had crazy claims versus realistic claims that I'm going to show you. And once again, this is all about specific conditions. So what's a crazy claim to one audience might be completely believable to another. So it's all about conditions. But I want to show you how you can use specificity and believability to really take an an offer statement to the next level. So here we have online coaches under 75K a month. We legally vow to deliver your first 100K a month within 90 days using our done for you infinity acquisition framework. And if we don't deliver, you don't pay a dime and we'll wire you $1,000 just to say sorry. The problem is in this audience, so many people have used offers that sound very similar to this that the stimulus is entropied. So your first 100k a month in 90 days. Any business owner who is under 75k a month should understand that this is hard. Like hitting 100k like you got to really push and doing it within 90 days is just not realistic. Honestly, it's not believable. done for you infinity acquisition framework doesn't it's it's vague. It doesn't explain what it actually does and it just sounds like you don't know what you offer and so you're coming up with this crazy thing and yeah and also we don't deliver. We don't pay a dime. This makes me think that you got some crazy contract and it's like it's not going to you're actually going to send me that. It just doesn't sound believable to me. Once again I could be the wrong Tarian audience here but I am an online coach currently under 75k a month. I've done over it a little bit, but usually under it. And I don't want it. I don't want to convert on this offer. But this one completely different. Coaching offers over 20K a month. We'll book you 25 plus extra qualified calls per month using our 100% done for you LinkedIn content system. So here we have a very reasonable outcome and we have a a tangible specific solution that actually makes sense. So not some infinity whatever. We've got done for you LinkedIn content system. I can picture what you're going to do already. Then we explain it. You don't have to move a finger. We'll take your existing YouTube content, repurpose it for LinkedIn, qualify leads, and set them into your calendar. Do you see how this is so believable? because it's just straightforward. All we need is an okay and your calendarly link to get started. I think this is cool. I think this is dope. And I would probably talk to somebody who hit me up with this offer if I was looking to get more calls. So, pretty crazy. Let's look at vague proof versus specific proof. So, vague proof. Four months later, my YouTube channel blew up. I see this all the time. This is just laziness. versus putting a picture there, having analytics, and telling them exactly what happened. What does blew up mean? I gained 120,000 views, 8,000 watchtime hours, and 4,000 subs in just four months. Very specific. I'm explaining what blew up even means. Some more examples. This course will make you rich, guaranteed. Versus, one of our students made $6,000 in his second month using a version of the same email you're about to write. Very good. You'll close every lead you talk to. Not believable because you won't, right? Versus this script won't close every lead, but it'll make sure that you never sound desperate again. So, it is giving you like a a really nice benefit and it sounds believable. You g you gain their trust. This system works insanely well versus after switching this format, David's open rates went from 23% to 51% in two days. Here's a subject line, very specific proof. Here's relating to specific conditions. So, anyone can do this versus if you've ever put calls but struggle to close them, this works well for you. You're relating to them, becoming more trustworthy. So, that was unbelievable versus believable copy. Now, let's look at boring versus epic copy. So, fixing boring copy. Here's an example of starting way too high on the awareness level. So once again, imagine when you first found my channel, you're already sold on copyrightiting. You want to figure it out. You You see one of my videos talking about a sales page. And then for 25 minutes, I explain why you need to make money online. And you're bored out of your mind cuz you're like, "Brother, I What do you What the freak do you think I'm doing? What do you think I'm trying to do? You're already too you're down the awareness level. And so if I'm starting way too high, it's going to be boring." Or imagine you're writing for a niche bodybuilding coach. So he works for the most jacked people who are trying to win competitions. And you write him a script on why working out is healthy and why someone should try to work out three to five times a week. Those guys are like, "No dip, Sherlock. I [___] press 400 lb. You're telling me to start lifting?" Like, it pisses people off when you start too high up the awareness level. And it all depends on specific conditions. So, if you're targeting retired moms who need to get in shape, well, this this could be a great email or a great YouTube script. It all depends on the specific conditions. So, let's look at an example of research paper copy versus easy to read copy. Look at this word. This is terrible. Like this. Look at the massive words here. Yeah, I'm not even going to read that. It just looks painful. Versus this part of my sales page. The same secret that allowed me to make 22,63 in online income last month. And to be honest, it's not even a secret. It's actually very simple. Despite what the gurus have told you, you don't make money online by starting the latest trendy business model. Don't fall for the IPGA, I AI agency, growth operator scams. Do you see how fun this is to read? It's really fun. There's a lot of punchy words there. Look at the mountain copy. It goes up and down. It's just juicy. I've got rid of pretty much every word that doesn't add some kind of juice to what I'm saying. Look at the language. Freck all that. I'm going to be honest with you. It's pattern erupt. It's it's it's cool. These are obviously very extreme examples, but I'm telling you, a lot of you guys' copy is starting to look like this, and nobody wants to read that crap. Doesn't matter how smart you are. Like, dude, that's not fun to read. I don't care. You're a lunatic if you think this is fun. And people aren't sold through research papers. You can use research paper as proof. People want the easiest, quickest way to get the info they need and move on with their life. All right. Super vague language versus specific, concrete, visual language. This is vague as fuck, right? Our program helps you grow your business faster and easier with strategies that actually work. I see copy like this all the time and it's usually from people using AI that are being dumb. Look at this. In week one, we help you write a three message cold DM sequence that get replies from total strangers, even if you have zero audience. One of our students booked four calls in 48 hours using it. Very specific. Remember, people think in pictures, not words. So, your brain doesn't see these words when I say dope sunset, blue and red clouds, couple of sus rocks, maybe ice, that's what you see. I'm so funny, guys. Oh, gez. Uh, not this. Remember, they see in pictures. So, if you're not using specific language, uh, it's going to be a hard time for someone to make it through your sales page. Also, you can go specificity on is on a spectrum. So, if you just say food, people don't know what to think about. If you say fruit, they have a little bit better idea. Red fruit. They're getting closer. Apple. Now you're getting closer. Then you have craziness. Freshly picked. Crisp and red and yellow Fiji apple with a few green leaves on top and a worm on the leaf. It was picked in upstate New York. So fresh that it still has a few

specks of that fresh New York dirt on it. You can smell the freshness. That specificity. Now, obviously, you don't you don't go in this much depth for everything, but it's a slider. Understand that it can go a lot further than you think. And make it be a movie. All right. Pretty cool. And that's it for the concise examples. So hopefully that gives you guys an idea, just a little head start on what to look for when looking to make concise, enjoyable, fun to read copy. So the Cub method we just covered is all about removing reasons why someone wouldn't read your copy. So removing the negatives, getting rid of the fluff, the dead stuff. Creating curiosity is giving them a reason why they would read your copy. So adding in the positives, adding in the spice. So now that your copy is concise, let's add in the flavor of curiosity. And technically, you'd probably add in curiosity first, but for the sake of this module, they're flip-flopped. But you get the point. Curiosity is one of the most powerful motivators for holding attention and creating action. So curiosity leads to action and you're trying to create action. It's the reason you click on thumbnails. It's the reason you watch murder mysteries and shows. It's the reason you keep reading great copy all from curiosity. So when we create curiosity, what we're doing is we're introducing a knowledge gap, a mental itch that your reader has to scratch. So, you felt this a million times a day. Probably if you open up short form and you see the start of a reel and next thing you know, you don't even know what happened the next minute. You're just watching this reel that you had no business watching. It's because they created a mental itch and you didn't want to leave the screen until it got scratched. And it's called a knowledge gap because you're you're proposing a gap between the information they currently know and the information they need to know. And when we're selling, the information they need to know is usually around getting their desired outcome. That's very important, and we'll talk about this more in a second. But curiosity happens when your audience knows just enough to feel like they're missing something important. So your job as a marketer is to grab their attention by creating that gap in the knowledge and then hold their attention by not closing it too soon. And for entertainment, you can create curiosity using anything intriguing whether it's useful or not. This is Instagram reels. This is Tik Tok. You're curious to see what to see what happens just because you're curious. Like there's no problem there. like you just literally are entertained. But for selling, you create curiosity using their desired outcome as leverage. We'll go over more examples in a second, but here's an example for entertainment. So, this is Veritasium's channel. Why are there 96 million black balls on this reservoir? Does this have anything to do with you making money? No. You're just bored. and you see this thumbnail and you're like, "Well, frick. Why are there?" And so you click on it because you want to figure out the question. It introduced a gap. You understand that 96 million is a big number. You understand that black balls are a weird thing. You you kind of understand what a what a reservoir is. Oh, I crack myself up. So, you have this knowledge already, but

there's this missing knowledge of why are these things all put together? Why? Why are there so many black balls on this reservoir? And so, guess what? You click on the video because you want to fill in that gap. These are the asteroids to worry about. This one actually has a little bit of problem solving in it because you don't want to die. And so, you're like, "Well, which asteroid should I be worried about?" Does it actually solve a problem, though? Because what what can you do about an asteroid? Freaking nothing, bro. You're out here trying to write emails. But it's curiosity. All these things are very very curiosityinducing. And you see how I mean it resonated. 40 million views plus on every single one. It's all about creating that mental itch. So the mental itch that Veritassium creates with his thumbnails is so strong that tens of million people are willing to trade an action, meaning clicking the thumbnail, investing their time just to scratch that itch. So, they'll trade the action, clicking the thumbnail to scratch the itch of I want I want to I want to answer this question. Why is there so many balls in this reservoir? And by slowly releasing more information throughout the video, he holds the attention of his viewers and then finally answers the questions at the end, filling the knowledge gap, satisfying the edge. That is how a good entertaining YouTube video works. But what about selling? Once again, for entertainment, you can use anything to create intrigue. You're just trying to entertain someone. But for selling, you want to create curiosity using their desired outcome as leverage. That's the thing they want to get to that they have to use your information to do it. A good example is Iman Godzi's One Thing promo. I've linked this video. It's actually deleted, but someone re-uploaded it. You can check it out. But here's the intro. Have you ever looked at all these people online and ask yourself, how do they get so rich? And then he goes into like this like cinematic sequence of like this question. So he like bakes this question into your brain. How do they get so rich? That's how he creates the gap. You are not rich. These people are rich and you want to be rich, but there's something in the middle that you're not realizing. He's already opened the gap in the first sentence. It's a skill set. I have to give that out. Most people live like slaves. Personal experience. There's one specific thing. So, to make this more look like actual copy, this is just a transcript from JBT. But he immediately says there's a difference between where you're at and where you want to be. It's because of this one thing. And that one thing is going to lead you down the sales message. Because if you don't read this sales message, you're never going to unlock the riches that you want. That's how we use curiosity for selling. And we'll go over how to do that right now. So, how do we use these concepts in our own marketing? Well, the first step is we want to create a knowledge gap by directly or indirectly posing a question or problem that your audience wants to know the answer to. So, in copyrightiting, we typically do this by showing them how they're missing something, some secret or hidden information that they need to achieve their desired outcome. There's a lot of creators who end up getting a lot of attention, but they're still broke because the way they get attention is by just using random stuff to create curiosity. to attract people who want to pay to solve a problem. You use their problem, their their dream outcome as leverage. That's how you create the curiosity. So, you don't see Iman out here making like weirdo, you know, trick shot compilations and trying to see, oh, is the ball going to go in? Like, no, he's out here talking about, hey, there's one thing you need to get rich and you don't know it. He's leveraging what you want for you to to consume his sales message. So, the best way to kind of visualize this is you have current knowledge where you're at. You have a dream outcome. And that dream outcome is locked behind your secret or hidden information that you had that's in your sales message that's in your real or your lead magnet, whatever it is you're trying to to sell. And that question mark lock is separating them from where they are now to where they want to be. And they can unlock this lock by taking the action you want them to take. By watching the video, by consuming the sales measures, by check out the VSSL, by booking a call, you're leveraging their dream outcome to get them to do whatever you want them to do to watch the video, open the email, whatever. And this could be done directly or indirectly. So, an example of a more indirect method would be when we looked at the data, we noticed something weird that completely changed our marketing forever. Let me explain. So something weird is that purple thing, but you didn't just flat out say you had some hidden information. You you just said that you you noticed something. It's always around a thing. There has to be some kind of hidden mechanism or secret info versus more direct. This is like kind of like the Eman. There's one secret technique that could quite possibly double the returns from your marketing efforts. So indirect is like we found something that's kind of mysterious. there's this thing that'll help you. Direct is saying, "Hey, I've got this secret thing and it'll help you get what you want." As always, which route you take should depend on your audience's specific conditions. So, use your critical thinking skills. Which approach do you think would work best for your for this specific campaign, for that specific type of copy? Is it indirect, more like a story, more like, oh, we just happen to find this thing? or is it more direct? Like, I've got this thing and you need it. So, let's go over some tactical ways you can do this. Now, don't get overwhelmed by these. I know you It's funny because you guys love tactics and you hate tactics. You want tactics because it gives you something useful. You feel like it's easily productive. But when you get too many, you don't know what to do. So, I'm just going to tell you all these, but come back to them later. You don't have to use these right now. I'm going to put this in a very simple checklist at the end of this module. So, don't worry. But I want to give you options to give you some some things that will help you start some ideas. And you could feed these into chat GBT using your specific conditions to kind of create some hooks. But once again, Chad GBT sucks at writing copy, but it's great at giving you ideas. And you, if you're great at writing copy, can make great stuff from the Chad GBT nonsense. So number one, a glimpse of a solution. This is where you give them a glimpse of something they don't know, but they need to know. So, most people are one sentence away from doubling their prices. There's a reason your emails aren't getting open, and it's not what you think. So, we're hinting out something, some hidden information. Next, ask a provocative question. What if everything you knew about productivity was wrong? Why are seven figure coaches using this ugly landing page? So, it's curious question. You're like, I don't know why. I do want to figure it out. Number three, contradiction/p paradox. Flip the expectations. Say something that sounds wrong but is actually right. We stopped posting content and grew faster. How our worst performing ad made the most money. So the curiosity is in how did that happen? Because it's the opposite of what you think should happen. You see this a lot on thumbnails these days where it's like how to how to grow your YouTube channel and it's like stop posting content. It's a paradox, contradiction. People want to figure out, well, how's that? How's that happen? Four, open a loop, a story loop, a cliffhanger. So, start a story or insight, but don't finish it. I was two days away from quitting and then this happened. We tested five headlines. One crushed the rest, but it shouldn't have. So, there's a cliffhanger there. You want to know what what's how why didn't why why why how did it crush when it shouldn't have. Number five, imply a hidden secret. Nobody talks about this part of freelancing, but it matters more than your skill. We discovered something weird buried in this data. Shock or surprise? Pattern erupt. We deleted 30% of our list and made more money. This is what happens when you drink seven copies before a sales call. You want to figure out what what what does happen. Number seven, tease the result but not the how. So he went from zero to 10K a month in 43 days. You see this a lot in testimonial emails or in testimonial videos. This one strategy added 1,200 subscribers overnight. So you talk about the strategy and because this is such a big result, you want to know how did that strategy get that result. Number eight, use odd or specific details. So very random or hypersp specific things kind of pull our brain in. So how a Ukrainian bakery helped us fix our onboarding process. You're like what? That's odd. The $7 PDF that made us $100,000. You're kind of like it's kind of contradictory. A lot of these kind of tie in together, but you know you know what I'm saying. Nine. Turn the mirror on the reader. Are you unknowingly pushing leads away? If you had to sell 10 times more tomorrow, would you know what to change? So asking them, which leads to them seeking clarity. Number 10, call out mistakes or hidden problems. If you're writing emails like this, you're leaving thousands on the table. Use incomplete comparisons. So this is when you make an analogy, um, but you don't explain it all the way. So like, think of it like a gym, but for closing clients. This salesunnel works like Netflix, but better. You're like curious. Well, Netflix is great. Like, how could this be better than Netflix? How is a sales fun like Netflix? You you it instantly spawns in all these questions. All of these are all about creating a question in the reader's mind. It's the gap.

7. Concise-Curiosity

The question is is is the gap between what they know, what they want to know. Taboo or forbidden framing implies something edgy or off limits. this persuasion trick, ban from TV ads. This was so aggressive, Facebook almost banned our account. This actually worked on me as a kid. Uh there was this driver when it comes to playing golf. It was banned from the PGA tour. So, of course, me not being on the PGA and wanting to crush all my friends with the longest drive possible, I really wanted that driver because it was forbidden from the PGA. So, it must be crazy good. 13. Use numbers without context. So quantify the outcome, but leave the why unanswered. Seven reasons why we stopped running retargeting ads. 22K in one day, and it wasn't even a launch. 14. Visual curiosity triggers. This is for videos, for thumbnails, for ads, whatever. Out of context screenshots, weird expressions, blurred out faces, censored text, split screen contrast. This is just visual curiosity. How do you pose the question visually? 15. Time bomb framing imply that something big is actively unfolding or it's on the clock. So, we only have four days to make this work. We're losing $1,000 a day until we fix this. And then you could just use curiosity, you know, words and phrases. Weird trick. No one talks about this. What happened next shocked us. Insider secret lesson. Stupidly simple. Almost gave up. This blew my mind. The internet lied to you. You get the point. All right. So, once you've grabbed someone's attention by creating the curiosity gap, you now need to hold on to it while delivering your sales message and moving them through your funnel. This is extremely important. In fact, this is like the secret to really a great sales message or a great YouTube video, whatever you're trying to do. And everything you've learned so far in the entire course is going to affect this. So, how well you hit specific conditions, how well you've crafted your problem chain, how well you use text and subtext, it's all going to affect this, but I briefly want to cover like how this is done through the concepts in this module. So, curiosity. So the two main variables in holding attention when it comes to curiosity is number one how compelling your hook your knowledge gap is. So that question that you've raised in their minds how intriguing is it? How deep did you dig the hook? And once that gap is created, how much would someone be willing to pay to scratch that mental itch? So, it's always on a spectrum. If you look at YouTube thumbnails, the one you click on on your home screen is usually the one that has created the deepest hook, the one that you can't wait to click on. You got to click on it now. It has to be first. And so whatever you're doing, ask yourself, how can we create a more compelling knowledge gap? Example that we used to use for our YouTube videos is, would someone pay $100 for this video if it delivered on the promise of the title and thumbnail? And so when we had a title and thumbnail that was so curiosityinducing that someone would pay a hundred bucks if it actually solved the question it posed, that's when we knew we had a banger because you understand your hook is very deep at that point if someone's willing to pay this much to solve the gap. And two, this is so so important. is the pace at which you release information. And so to hold someone's attention once you have it, you have to drip feed them information, making them feel like they're progressing closer to closing the gap, to getting that big payoff, the answer. If you give away too much too fast, they feel like they got the answer already and they'll move on. But if you give away too little, too slow, they'll get bored and unmotivated and they'll move on. You have to balance giving them the information to keep stringing them along towards that goal. You have to balance being unexpected. If you have too much chaos, they'll get confused and they'll get lost and they'll click off. But a great plot twist or a pattern erupt is a great way to re-engage people. It's all about balance. This is something that Mr. Beast has really mastered. It's why he gets so many views is because his specific conditions basically meaning like you know brain dead humans everywhere. He's figured out the perfect pace at which he progresses the story to where it's not too fast where it overwhelms people and they click off, but it's not too slow where people get bored. It's the perfect pace. This is so key. So, the key to holding attention is number one, creating a powerful curiosity gap that they have to solve and then giving them just the right amount of information at the correct speed to keep them engaged. And a simple example of this is murder mysteries. Think about how a murder mystery works. I love these things, by the way. I love love murder mysteries. It starts by opening a juicy loop, dramatic question that you want solved. Who did it? Who did this murder? As it progresses, you're given more and more clues that lead you closer to the big payoff, but you're not given too much clues to where you know who it is. You're given just enough to start posing more questions in your head, and you have a suspect, but you don't know if it's 100% them yet. You're also hit with unexpected turns along the way, which make you rethink the assumptions you've already made. So, just when they give you all these clues and you think, "Man, I think I know who it is." That's when the murder mystery hits you with a a turning point. You're like, "Oh crap, it couldn't have been them." And now you got to rethink all those assumptions you just made and you're so you're engaged or you're locked in. And it ends with a a juicy epic payoff as the murderer is exposed and your mental itch is scratched. Your copy should feel similar. The biggest mistake I see beginners make when it comes to curiosity is you give away too much information too fast. This is something that I screwed up so much in my early career. I was so scared of being quote unquote salesy that I would give away everything immediately. And I would sit there and wonder, "How come people don't buy my stuff? How come people aren't watching my videos? How come people aren't this? Because if I hooked them in the title and thumbnail and then give away the answer to whatever I hooked them with in the first 5 seconds, why would they watch the rest of the video? You see, people love mystery. Don't give everything away immediately because you're scared of being salesy. String them along just enough to keep them intrigued and excited to change their beliefs, sell them your awesome product, and change their life.

7. Concise-Curiosity

Now once again, how much to change each variable completely depends on the specific conditions of your audience and the consumption patterns of the medium of your copy. Let me make this very clear. Example, you've got an 18-year-old watching an Instagram reel. He's going to need more concise information, faster pace to stay to stay engaged versus you have a 50-year-old reading a sales letter they received in the mail. You can release information a lot slower, different specific conditions, different medium of copy. And what's very important is that same 18-year-old can go to a movie theater and watch a movie where information is released a lot slower. All because of the frame they're in when exposed to that copy. So when you're scrolling through TikTok, your brain is in a very like hyper ADHD state. You expect to just keep scrolling. And so watching a two-minute Tik Tok feels like eternity. But if you watch two minutes into a movie, it feels like nothing. You're the same person. But it's all about expectations and the frame you're in when you're consuming that information. So, as always, use your critical thinking skills based on the principles you've been taught throughout this whole course. Don't just start willy-nilly slinging stuff out there. Think. Think. And to tie everything together, let's take a look at how I leverage this principle in one of my successful sales pages. My mouse died. Let me pull it back up. Here we go. DPS. As you can see, headline, how anyone can master the art of digital persuasion. I made this word up, so no one knows what it is yet. It's curiosityinducing. I made this much after I learned this skill. Have you ever wondered why does it seem like everyone's making money online except me? I've tried everything, but nothing is working. What's the real secret? Do you see what I did here? I literally opened up that gap immediately. As soon as I start the sales page, we immediately do this. I immediately say, "Here's what you know. Here's what you want to do. And there's something secret." This same secret allowed me to make this much. And to be honest, it's not even a secret. It's very simple. This right here feels like you're getting new insights, like I'm I'm teaching you more. But am I actually showing anything? No. Despite what the gurus have told you, making money online is not about this. You feel like you're getting value. You're learning something. But have you learned at all what the secret is I'm talking about? No. I'm talking about what it's not, which makes you even more curious to what it might be. And here I talk about you haven't learned the most valuable skill. So, they still don't know what the skill is. I'm giving away a little bit of information slowly. Trust me, I learned this the hard way. Curiosity. I'm opening another loop here. What did he learn the hard way? What is the hard way? What happened? I was in a dark place. You see how I'm opening loops? I'm starting stories. It's It feels very murder mysteriesque. I'm asking more questions. What if I never make money online? Those were dark days. Now I'm talking about actually coming across this skill. And here I'm I'm just slowly giving more information that's concise, that's juicy without giving it all away immediately. I literally could have taken this right here, right? If you combine persuasion with the power of the internet, you can persuade people at scale. I could have that could have been the first sentence. I could have given it away immediately, but I didn't. I withheld the information. I built the curiosity. I gave them more context. I entertained them. They learned more about me. So, by the time I tell them this, they're actually ready to believe it. Crazy stuff, man. Crazy stuff. So, that just shows you a little example of how to how I literally did this with my sales page. I did like 90K in couple months. No, more than a couple, but like we were doing 20K a month with this for like three, four months straight, which is crazy before I shut it down. All from one good sales page and using these concepts. So, since this module, like I said, is very tactic heavy, it can feel a bit overwhelming at first. And to combat this, me and Virgil, shout out to Virgil, had the idea of making a simple checklist that you can use to add this into whatever you're writing. So, once again, you're not going to master this overnight. It takes time. But the first step is knowing that this even exists, which is why I'm making this module. Let's go over a simple checklist that you can use to increase any copy you're writing. Number one, have you simplified your copy as much as possible? Simple language, simple examples. Have you stuck to the one big idea? Are you using as few words as you possibly can? Number two, is your copy as entertaining as possible? Does it appeal to their emotions and desires? Does it use visual concrete language? Is it easy to read slashformatted well? Have you avoided all the technobabble, all the crazy specific technical stuff? Number three, are your claims believable? Is your proof solid? Do your claims match your audience's current belief of what's possible? Very important. Number four, have you created a compelling knowledge gap to hook your audience? What question are you trying to imply? Is that question juicy to your audience? and doesn't feel like they have to know the answer. If you have not created this feeling, you're doing something wrong in your copy. They must feel compelled to keep watching, keep reading to figure out the answer. Number five, are you releasing clues to the question at the right pace? So once you've created this question, are you drip feeding them information at just the right pace? So does this rate of release fit the medium your copy is on? So for example, faster for short form, a little bit slower for long form. Does the rate the rate of release fit the audience you're targeting? I.e. faster for youngsters, slower forks. Once again, it's all specific conditions. Number six, do you have any tasteful plot twists or pattern interrupts to increase engagement? Do you remind them of that question throughout your video to keep them hooked? So, if you see in the sales page, you'll see me talk about over and over again. the skill that made me this much in one month. The most valuable skill, the secret allowed me to do this much. So, I'm constantly reminding people that there's a lot at stake here. You have to read this message if you want to make money online. And you'll watch watch any of the biggest YouTubers and watch how after the first 15 to 30 seconds, they will remind people of what's to come at the end of the video. they'll rehook them. And once again, use this sparingly. It's always a balance. If you do nothing but remind them of this hook, they're going to get bored and leave. But if you remind them at just the right point where they might be kind of disengaging, they remember why they're here in the first place and they're rehooked. So, as always, use the hyperarning cycle, right? Feel free to use these questions to break down other people's copy and study how they've used these concepts. Yeah, guys, hope you enjoyed this one. This one was really fun to make and honestly not something I've covered a whole lot up to this point, but this is very, very important. And if you don't know anything else, this isn't as important, but now that you guys have this insane foundation of really strong marketing fundamentals, this becomes very powerful. So, hope you guys enjoyed. And as always, quick reminder, if you want me to crank out more modules like this one, and even better, let me know any wins, any breakthroughs you had, any thoughts you have on this module or the entire course in the course wins channel in the Discord. And uh it gives me energy to know that these modules are helping people. So, love you'all and I'll see you all in the next one.
